WASHINGTON - For battle-weary Democrats, the big stories out of Pennsylvania are simple: Their night of victory.

Joe Biden's victory in Pennsylvania on Tuesday night marked the end of a long, hard-fought campaign for the Democratic Party. It was a moment of celebration and relief for many of the party's members, who had worked tirelessly to get out the vote in a state that had repeatedly eluded them in recent years.

Democrats won Pennsylvania by a margin of 7 percentage points, according to preliminary results, reversing the 2016 election result when Donald Trump carried the state by 44,000 votes. The win was a significant blow to Republicans, who had been hoping to make gains in the state to help them recapture the House of Representatives.

Biden's victory came as a welcome relief to Democrats in a state where they had been struggling for years. The state is home to many of the country's largest cities, including Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, and is a key swing state in presidential elections.

Democrats had been hoping for a strong showing in Pennsylvania, where they had been outspent by Republicans. They had invested heavily in voter outreach and mobilization efforts, and had worked to turn out a diverse coalition of voters.

The win in Pennsylvania was a significant boost for Democrats, who are hoping for a wave of victories in other key battleground states. If they can carry Pennsylvania, they have a better chance of winning back control of the House of Representatives.

Democrats are now looking ahead to the November 3 election, where they hope to maintain their momentum and build on their success. They are hoping to win back control of the House and possibly the Senate, and are working tirelessly to get out the vote and turn out their base.

The win in Pennsylvania is a strong sign of hope for Democrats, who are looking to build on their momentum and carry their success into the November election. They are working hard to maintain their momentum and build on their success, and are looking forward to a bright future for the party.